

ed at $80 per acre, and which not available for building purses. It is not so much the rate taxation that is high or low, as that the basis of taxation should be equal and fair.

There can be no doubt that even under our present system the Levy Court can do a great deal to equalize this base. For years, the custom has been in the Levy Court to make the commissioners from adjoining hundreds the committee to go over the assessors work, verify and so far as possible equalize. In the days when all of New Castle County, outside of the City of Wilmington, was one farming community, this was a proper plan, as the members from the adjoining hundreds were familiar with the situation locally, and fairly able to judge of values and to particularly see that no properties were omitted or doubly assessed. But with the growth of the suburban residence section to the North, East and West of Wilmington, consideration should be given to the value of land for that purpose. Take the first named of the three hundreds above, Brandywine. It has two great trunk lines of railroads, with accommodation trains at all hours for the sole accommodation of these suburbanites, a trolley road, with cars carrying nearly their capacity every half hour, and two turnpikes. It only needs to be thought of to know that values there must have wonderfully increased in the past five or ten years. And yet the assessed value remains practically the same as it was twenty years ago.

It is not fair to communities like ours, and the Levy Court could and should try and remedy it, by appointing one of the members from the truly rural parts of the county, on the committee to compare and revise the assessments of those hundreds, and a member from that section to see how our rates are.

ANSWERS

By Dr. M. B. Burstan, Optician

Q. Why do school children with good sight, require glasses?

A. Mainly to rest the eyes. The eye does not obtain its growth until the child is about the age of twelve. The growing eye is taxed beyond its strength; the proper glasses rest and preserve the eyes.

Q. Why do children squint?

A. By squinting or frowning the muscle in the eye is relieved of strain; this is nature's way.
Steady glasses relieve this strain,
and thus prevent squint.

Q. Why do children have eye headaches?

A. An eye headache is a reflex pain caused by straining the
the pain may be over eyes;
the eyes or through the temples.
The remedy for eye headache is relief glasses, to be worn while studying.

THE TWO MOST IMPORTANT THINGS

For you to consider in an August Sale are the quality of the goods and the genuineness of the reductions.

We positively do not search the markets for cheap lots of undesirable and unworthy goods to mark them at inflated prices and show larger August reductions.

Every piece in our large building—whether the discount be 10 or 50 per cent.—is from our own regular stock, and marked at our reasonable prices. Each piece during this month has two tags, one showing the regular price and the other the August price.

Uncollected Letters.—The following list of letters remain uncollected in the post office for the week ending Aug. 1st: Miss Alice Blockson, Miss Sarah S. Brown, Mrs. W. W. Wilson, Mr. C. W. Heather, Mr. Allen Jackson.

The attention of our readers is called to the large advertisement of M. Megary & Son Co., Sixth and Tenth Streets, Wilmington. They tell their own story on the second page of THE TRANSCRIPT.

The young men and the young ladies of Seaford played a game of base ball, recently. The game resulted in a victory for the ladies by the score of 9 to 7. In order to give the ladies a fair trial, all the men wore skirts and used their left hands in catching and throwing the ball.

Bethesda Methodist Episcopal Sunday School held its annual picnic at Lorewood Grove on Thursday, and a large number of scholars and their friends spent a delightful day. Transportation was furnished by our generous farmers, and while the attendance was not so large as on former occasions, everybody was pleased with the day's outing.

This is undeniably a season of prosperity, if the constant puffing and hauling of steam railroad trains is any indication. Fifty-eight trains pass up the Pennsylvania Railroad Company's Delaware peninsula lines every day of twenty-four hours. One train passing northward at midnight Tuesday broke all records for length. It contained eighty-five cars, some gondolas but nearly all box cars.

On account of the unusual cool weather in June the prospect for eating watermelons before the middle of August looks dark. It is greatly feared that the crop will not compare favorably in size and quality with those of previous years. It is also probable that the growers will realize good price for them during the entire summer.

Coroner Callaway has filed a certificate with the Board of Health which sets forth that the death of William E. Denby, the colored prisoner who died at the work-house last Thursday, was the result of a gunshot wound. Denby was shot during a dispute over a crap game near town on Sunday, July 20th, by Elzie Wiggins, of this town, but he made his escape immediately after the shooting, and at this writing has not been apprehended.

Miss Mary Beaten gave a delightful strawdole to Lorewood Grove on Thursday, and after spending a delightful day at the Grove, they returned home at a late hour. Those present were: Misses Elizabeth Richards, Mary Beaten, Lena Weber, Sophia Blome, Prudence Lewis, Lillian Walker, Iola Boehm, Lulu Vinard, and Messrs. Norman Kemp, J. H. Vinard, Woodall Cochran, Ringgold Richards, Robert Rallege, George Richards, Edward Blome, Norman Gill, Middletown; Miss Mary O'Day, Seaford; Miss Mary Phillips, Chester, Pa.; Mr. Elmer Burk, Newark, N. J.

While walking along the street in Delmar Tuesday night, Mr. Frank C. Jolla of this town was waylaid and assaulted by a man of that town, and at this writing Mr. Jolla is in a serious condition. During the past month he has been employed as clerk in one of the hotels at Delmar, and after closing up Tuesday night and while passing by an alley, a man jumped from the alley and dealt him a heavy blow on the head. Two men who were passing by ran to his assistance and succeeded in capturing his assailant. Mr. Jolla was brought to Middletown Wednesday morning, and later taken to the Homeopathic Hospital in Wilmington for treatment.

SURPRISED THEIR FRIENDS

The marriage of Joseph C. Parker, Jr., to Miss Alberta H. Cochran on Wednesday was a great surprise to their numerous friends here. The ceremony was performed by Rev. C. T. Wyatt, at the residence of Harrison Street M. E. Church, at 12:30 o'clock. The young couple went to Wilmington on the 10:20 train, and were met at the station in Wilmington by Mr. W. Reese Parker, brother of the groom, and after securing their license were immediately married. The ring ceremony being used. They took dinner at the Clayton House and after a short automobile ride in the city, left for Atlantic City and Delaware Water Gap. The young couple are both prominent and popular, and their friends here were taken completely by surprise. Mr. and Mrs. Parker will reside in Middletown.

THE MISSISS LOCKWOOD ENTERTAIN

The Misses Marie, Blanche and Julia Lockwood entertained at their home on Chestnut street, on Thursday morning, August 8th, from 9 to 12. About seventy-five guests were present. The successful contestants of the several games played were: Mrs. Frank R. Pool, Mrs. Julius Clayton, and Mrs. Eubree. At noon refreshments were served, after which the favors for the occasion—tiny ribbon trimmed baskets of candy—were handed each guest.

Those present were: Mrs. John Cooke, Mrs. Alfred Chamberlain, Mrs. Julius Clayton, Mrs. J. C. Stiles, Mrs. Jesse L. Shepherd, Mrs. H. M. Schroeder, Mrs. George L. Townsend, Jr., Mrs. John Watkins, Mrs. M. M. Davis, Mrs. Isaac Gibbs, Mrs. Harry Griffith, Mrs. Cuthbert Green, Mrs. McCloskey, Mrs. J. H. Mendinhall, Mrs. Dorsey W. Lewis, Mrs. W. B. Biggs, Mrs. Frederick Brady, Mrs. G. A. Barton, Mrs. M. B. Burris, Mrs. Clarence Pool, Mrs. E. S. Faltenhainer, Mrs. A. S. Bright, Mrs. Frank Pool, Mrs. Howard Pool, Mrs. Harry Hardcastle, Mrs. J. P. Cochran, Mrs. Duval Gibbs, Mrs. Embree, Mrs. Walter Woods, Mrs. Joseph Griffith, Mrs. John Naudain, Mrs. G. L. Cochran, Mrs. Samuel Ford, Misses Lydia, Adele and Josephine Cochran, Agnes Clark, Agnes Cochran, Helen Shallos, May Clayton, Esther Shallos, Blanche Wright, Laura and Clara Witte, Mabel Derrickson, May Holten, Estelle and Ada Marsh, Frances McCloskey, M. Emma March, Maria and Mary Nowland, Dora E. Price, Elizabeth Price, Mary and Nellie Rothwell, Sylvia Arthur, Jodie Biggs, Rachel and Adelaide Mifflin, Susan Naudain, Elizabeth Lockwood, Lione Beeson, Ada L. Lockwood and Sylvia Moore.

When writing kindly state what price you are willing to pay, and how many there will be in the party and how many rooms will be required.

Miss McGill will be glad to meet persons on arrival and take them where they will be well satisfied with their surroundings during their stay in the city.

FAMILIES ARE NEEDED, TOO

State Board Carrying Out Provisions of Immigration Bill

The State Board of Agriculture, with this week, determine upon one of four courses open to it by suggestion and proposition from various channels, to carry into effect the immigration act for the relief of Delaware farmers and the opening of untitled lands in this State, which statute carries with it an annual appropriation of $2,000.

The four propositions, which have been puzzling the Board, reduced as it is to rigid economy to see that the $2,000 is wisely and most profitably expended in a manner that will bring sure results are:

First, to communicate with help agencies all over the country asking for families to come to Delaware and assist the farmers of this State in whatever operations they can be found useful.

Second, to employ a Philadelphia labor agent who speaks five languages and is recommended by prominent trade organizations and corporations, to Finland, Norway and Germany, to secure immigration of rural laborers to this State.

Third, to go into Northern Canada, where it is most unproductive and place before dissatisfied inhabitants there the good prospects awaiting them in the fruit farming districts of productive Delaware.

Fourth, to visit Lancashire, England, where the disastrous rainy season has impoverished and discouraged the population, and there present the claims and opportunity of Delaware agriculture.

"I have been represented as saying that the farmers of Delaware were not paying enough wages and that was the trouble," said Secretary Wesley Webb to-day, "but that is a misquotation. I did say that we could not compete with South Carolina which State if supporting foreign agencies at large appropriations, to get men to immigrate to South Carolina and labor in the cotton fields in summer and the cotton mills in winter."

"But that is not exactly what we are after. Delaware has thousands of large farms with comfortable tenant houses thereon. Each tenant is allowed a garden plot of his own, and may keep a cow, poultry and hogs. If the family wants fuel, all they have to do is to go into the woods and cut it. In fruit season they all get enough extra fruit to conserve for the winter. Soon these families save enough to buy a small farm of their own."

A SCHEME THAT FAILED

Jack Van Brunt was the realization of an eager bridegroom as he sat and chatted with his best man of the morning in the private parlor of a snug little country hotel. His feet were as near the mantel as they could reach; and all his talk centered about his bride.

Of course you'll marry some day, Sam! he had just said in comment on his best man's gloomy remark about the scarcity of suitable brides and the arduous exercise of hunting for them.

We can't all expect your luck, Jack, Sam Hooker had said. I am one of life's certain bachelors. Jack made the room ring with his mocking laughter.

Oh, it's all very well for you, my boy, retorted the best man amiably. You've drawn a prize no one can pick holes in. All the girls who have taken my fancy seem to—don't you know?—to be just as ready to take up with one man as another. They're not what you may call born into the world to love just only one's self—like Miss Ballard. You mayn't appreciate the fact, but you've secured a unique prize. I haven't seen very much of Miss Ballard, but I've seen enough to feel pretty positive that you're all right.

Oh! said Jack Van Brunt, dropping his feet and turning upon his friend. You think she was born into the world for me, and me only, do you; and that there never could have been any doubt about it? My dear boy, you mistake. Why, a year ago, everyone in Barling believed she would marry a fellow named Houghton. They were engaged. I know the secret history of that abominable business; but I'm not going to talk about it. The rascal's far, far away, I hope. Sam, you are very young.

Something like three months older than your aged self, Jack—that's all. But, 'pon my word, you amaze me. Why didn't you tell me?

That about Sybil? Because I simply didn't choose, old man. But I tell you what. You're keen about a wife for yourself, or pretend to be. Well, now, there's a lovely young widow named Tyrrell—Nancy Tyrrell—at the Ballards' for to-morrow's festival. I've my doubts about her constancy, but none about her beauty. Just make up to her, there's a good boy, and marry her out of the way of my wife. I don't want Sybil to keep up the acquaintanceship unless, as Mrs. Sam Hooker, for example, you can oblige by guaranteeing a model married woman.

The best man threw his head back and chuckled. What sublime selfishness! he exclaimed.

And then there was a knock at the door, and the pretty maid of the hotel presented her smiling face and a small packet.

Hullo! said Jack gaily; still they come, eh, Bessie? Thank you.

He assumed that it was another present, until he recognized Sybil's own writing. Even then he thought it might be perhaps something from Sybil's own dear self.

You may turn your back, Sam, he said.

I'll go out, said Sam. Jack opened a little box, and discovered first a letter, and beneath it—could he believe his eyes?—the ring of diamonds and rubies which he had given Sybil ten months ago, her engagement ring. Chilly with apprehensions and frowning fiercely, he unfolded the letter.

DEAR JACK: I cannot marry you to-morrow. It is the most impossible thing in the world now, and I have no right even to say that I am sorry. Do you remember saying the other evening that if this were to happen you would go right off to the other end of the world? What a wicked, deceitful girl I felt myself to be when you said it; for, although I did not think then that this would happen, I knew it might. Please, as you are the most generous, good fellow I know, do just that, and forget me—forget that I ever lived. I cannot even ask you to forgive me, only forget, and I pray you soon may. It is no good asking questions, asking anyone questions, because only myself and another can answer them, and neither of us will. Think I think I have said enough. There's a body of me as you possibly can, and still it will not be badly enough. For a while year I have spoiled your life with my treachery. Jack, be merciful and don't make a scene, for the sake of others. I return the ring which has always given me more pain and humiliation than pleasure; and I have only one more request to make, which I am sure you will grant. Please either burn my letters, if you have kept them, or return them to me as soon as possible. Believe me that I hope you will quickly find someone better than I.

SYBIL BALLARD.

Van Brunt stood for some minutes with this thunderbolt in his hand. Was it credible? Yes, for it was Sybil's writing, and there was the ring. But even then—

He staggered to the window of the parlor, just in time to see the little company of arrivals by the last train pass from the station to the town. He stared at them without noticing them. The procession ended. No, not quite. There was one more—a gentleman with the New York stamp upon him, in well-cut clothes and a tall hat; a handsome, defiant man of about thirty.

By heaven! whispered Jack, as his gaze was held by this man; then it must be true! Lionel Houghton!

In less than two minutes he was out of the hotel, and making through the garden for the field path to Barling's station. A New York train was all but due. If he could catch it!

He caught it, and, late in the afternoon, reached his bachelor apartments. During the journey he had arranged his programme. Sybil would get her letters all right on the morning that was to have been her wedding day. And by then he would be far away, beginning, he hoped, to forget her.

All he wanted was to hide his head for a spell and think. Like enough, then, it would be the antipodes for him.

Oh, Syb, Syb! he wailed, after a miserable glance at the last of those loved letters. My very dearest Jack! it started. He could see the light in her sweet eyes with which he believed, she had penned the words.

But that weak mood left him, and at a quarter to six he carried the parcel to the postoffice and registered it.

Sam Hooker was wrong, after all. Sybil was no better than all the rest. Hers was a vile, hypocritical sex.

Instead, however, of going far away, he returned to Barling by the half-past eight train from town. It was no good pretending that he hated Sybil. He loved her still—was almost inclined, indeed, to believe that she was more sinned against (conspired against, at any rate) than herself a sinner. But there was someone whom he did not mistakenly hate as only an outraged man can hate a fellow creature. That was Mr. Lionel Houghton.

Right or wrong, he yearned to get his hands at the throat of this fine gentleman.

Sybil had told him about it with such wistful sadness ten months ago.

Of course, Jack, I never loved him, but I let poor papa do what he chose with me. He pleaded so hard. Mr. Houghton could have turned him out into the world as a beggar, and papa believed he would if I did not promise to marry him. And so I promised. And then Uncle Henry died, and papa could pay off all he owed, and he was as glad as I that I could be true to myself; and Mr. Houghton went to Europe. He said he would go and make more money there, just to drown his disappointment. And then you came, Jack, and life was all different. I never knew what happiness was until you came, Jack; but tell me again that you don't think any the worse of me for being willing, though ever so miserably, to marry Mr. Houghton to save papa.

How well Jack remembered her words? He had taken her to his heart afterward and told her she was an angel. Henceforth and forever his angel.

Back in Barling, he paused at the turning to the north end of the town (Sybil's part) and looked up at the stars.

What was he doing? Why had he returned? It meant only so much the more pain. The law would not allow him to strangle Lionel Houghton, and—worse still—disturb of Sybil made him doubt if Houghton was the chief sinner. That awful letter!

As for Sam Hooker, he gave no thought to him. He had avoided the hotel. Sam might ravel at the mystery of his disappearance to his heart's discontent. And then a young man came round the corner and accosted him.

Is anything the matter, Mr. Van Brunt?

Oh! how are you, Carlisle, my boy? said Jack, mechanically.

Willie Carlisle, telegraph operator, had good cause to respect Jack. On a June evening he had been seized with cramp in the river, and but for Jack would assuredly have been drowned. There was little he would not do in return, and that very day he had been puzzling about something which he believed might concern Jack.

I mean to be at the wedding tomorrow, said Willie Carlisle. Not mine, said Jack, I—but—He grasped the lad's arm. You'd better not remember that you've seen me tonight here. My marriage—my marriage! He laughed a bitter, low laugh. There will be no marriage.

Mr. Van Brunt! And then Willie Carlisle was reckless of his official duty, for Jack's sake. Has Mr. Houghton anything to do with it? he whispered.

Why do you ask?

He has, then, I'm sure of it! There's a Mrs. Tyrrell staying at Fern House. She telegraphed to Mr. Houghton yesterday and again this morning. He was to come down at once to-day. She said something was managed. He telegraphed back that he would be at the Lion to-night. I didn't like it.

Jack patted the lad on the shoulder.

Good-night, he said, good-night. Trust me. I must think this over.

He walked away rapidly toward the river, and for a while gazed at the oily gleam of the dark water as it glided past his feet. He was equidistant from the Lion Hotel and Fern House. To which should he go first? And what then? He sat on the grass by the water under the bushes.

He was still in a turmoil of doubts and agitations when he heard whispering voices. They came nearer. And then he gripped his knees as he recognized them both—Houghton's and that woman's! They sat down on a bench by the path. And Jack restrained his breath almost to the suffocating point to listen.

Well, Clara, I must say if it comes off it will be the best bit of work you've ever done; but it's too much to expect.

No, it isn't. It has succeeded so far. He has gone. Don't you see he would surely have come at once for an explanation if my letter hadn't settled him? You'll admit now that I am clever?

My dear child, I never doubted that. Well, if it comes off, you're ten thousand dollars richer.

Yes, and I want it badly. If you knew what a bloodhounds' game I've had to play! The letter was quite simple. A fortnight's practice was enough for that. If only he will send her her letters, to back me up? I did so want to get the ring to pile on the agony, and by a most lucky chance, that happened. She forgot it for the first time in her life. I should think, after washing her hands for lunch, and I was too sharp for the poor dear. I believe she suspects me of stealing it, but so much the better! It will give me an excuse for a little tiff after to-morrow's hysterics, and I'll leave the place. Tell me again you are pleased with me.

Pleased! Jack heard the laugh which accentuated the word. As Punch, my girl! As Punch! But I've been thinking. I can't take up my cards without an interval. At the hotel they will understand my going away after an expression or two of disappointment, don't you know, at revisiting Barling on, for me, so inauspicious an occasion. Afterward, soon or late, I'll reappear, and then—

But you'll give me something on account before then? urged the woman.

You may safely leave that to me, Clara, safely. You're a pal to be proud of. But I've had enough of this. I want a little refreshment to cheer my wounded heart.

Yes, and I must return to entertain the folks at Fern House. Our bridegroom's gentleman may have paid us a visit in the meantime. Poor Sybil will want comforting.

Comfort her, Clara, for me, said the man, with another laugh. And then they departed.

Jack breathed freely again. He clasped his knees still, and was once more the happiest fellow in the world. The fiends! The unbelievable pair of fiends! he murmured.

Jack went neither to the Lion Hotel nor to Fern House that night. He returned cautiously to the hotel, and when his pale best man met with a Thank Heaven, old fellow! I thought you were lost, he took him by the arm and whispered things to him—told him as much of the conspiracy as seemed desirable, and then sent him to Fern House. It'll be my third visit in three hours, said Sam, and I'm afraid even the servants will see a difference in me this time.

You mustn't let there be any difference, until you are alone with Sybil herself, said Jack. Just bear that in mind, my dear Sam. Then tell her what I have told you. Give her that rogue's letter and the ring, and suggest from me that she goes straight to bed to avoid seeing the woman again to-night. You quite understand, Sam? I'm the one to tackle her in the morning, after that beauty has cleared out. Oh, they'll have their bad times, never fear. If I didn't feel in such a seventh heaven myself, I'd make it a worse time at once; but it's best not to make a scene.

And she was the party you thought I might marry! Sam couldn't help remarking.

Yes, said Jack, but I didn't mean it. Now go, my dear old chap. And she is not to open the parcel from town in the morning. Oh, Sam! I wish I dared come with you, but I must not.

In less than an hour he returned with his report. Sybil had borne it bravely. She was shocked, of course, but Jack's reappearance in Barling was a medicine for everything.

At eight o'clock the next morning Mr. Lionel Houghton marched off in high (though disguised) spirits for the train to town.

At nine o'clock Jack made for the Fern House, and brought tears into Mrs. Tyrrell's beautiful eyes. She left the house with him, however, as he commanded, and he saw her into another train for town.

And at half past two precisely Jack went to his wedding, with a proud and thankful heart.
